On Wednesday evening the electric lights operated by the current of the Consolidated Lighting Company grew dim and went out in Montpelier, remaining dark for several minutes. Inquiry at both stations of the company showed that the machinery was all right and that no cause was known for the dimming of the lights. But on Thursday afternoon an explanation of the cause was found. George A. Lathrop, living near Montpelier Junction, reported that on Wednesday evening a blinding flash of light occurred on the Consolidated's wires near his house; the next morning the charred body of a large blue heron was seen hanging from one of the wires. The bird had sought to alight on the ground but in the darkness had accidentally struck across the electric wires, thus electrocuting itself and forming a short circuit that continued until the body had sufficiently burned to fall away from one wire.
